Sweden was the first country to adopt an official policy of multiculturalism in Europe. In May 1975, a unanimous Swedish parliament passed an act on a new multiculturalist immigrant and ethnic minority policy put forward by the social democratic government, that explicitly rejected the ideal ethnic homogeneity and the policy of assimilation. The three main principles of the new policy were equality, partnership and freedom of choice.

How Europe lost faith in multiculturalism. However, the new conception of "culture" by which ministers could laud "the rapprochement between persons of highly diverse backgrounds and cultures" betrayed "an underlying sense of essential, unchanging difference". Viewed in this light, the multicultural mantra was a clever way of hiding the ethnically determined basis of German identity.
